Short dark cinematic fiction

Cold Down the Spine

Three scenes of dread, intimacy, and urban unreality

A slim dark-fiction volume collecting the archive's strongest scene work in horror and emotional unease, built for readers who prefer concise, atmospheric cinematic prose.

Curated from original source PDFs with layouts preserved.

Commercial edition. This short atmospheric collection is designed as a compact reader-facing book rather than a production notebook.

Plastic Hearts in a Concrete Jungle

An emotionally fractured city-piece about unreality, ache, and the cost of remaining human.

The following pages reproduce the original source PDF as part of this curated collection.

Scene — Plastic Hearts in a Concrete Jungle

This one is not built from craft. It's built from the ache. A city full of warmth that isn't warmth. A thousand smiles, not one of them alive. And one flesh heart walking through it — the only one that can still break, because it's the only one that was ever real.

The feeling (read this first, before any prompt)

The desert road was the fear — predators in the open, nowhere to hide. This is the loneliness — predators everywhere, dressed as friends. The concrete jungle isn't empty. It's full. That's the horror. Every face smiles. Every hand reaches out warm. And every heart is plastic — molded to look like love, cold when you finally touch it. You are the one real heart in the grey forest. It hurts because it's real. A plastic heart never aches. That's the trade it made.

> Don't shoot the cold. Shoot the loneliness of being the only warm thing in a warm-looking world.

Logline

A man walks through a crowded city street. Everyone smiles at him — warm, kind, welcoming. He reaches back. And one by one, up close, the smiles are perfect and hollow, the eyes glassy like mannequins. He is surrounded by warmth and utterly alone. The only beating heart in a city of plastic ones.

Master scene prompt (for Flow / Veo)

> Cinematic, emotional, a crowded modern city street between towering glass buildings, cold overcast daylight, a river of well-dressed people flowing past. One ordinary tired man moves against the current, searching faces. The crowd smiles at him — warm, welcoming, too perfect — but their eyes are glassy and empty, like beautiful mannequins. Muted desaturated palette, steel and grey and glass, one faint warm tone on the lone man only. Melancholic, still, dreamlike. Static locked-off camera — no zoom, no push-in, no camera movement whatsoever. No dialogue. The loneliness of being the only real heart in a crowd.

🔑 The single most important instruction: the lone man is the only warm-colored thing in the frame. Everyone else is cool, grey, glassy. That one warm tone is his living heart. Let the color carry the whole story.

Shot breakdown (~25–30 sec)

🎬 Why they came out monotonic: you were pasting the whole master paragraph into every shot, so Flow kept rebuilding the same wide street. Two fixes: (1) paste the short style tag below instead of the full paragraph, and (2) give every shot a different camera distance and angle — wide, then medium, then close, then macro. Varied framing is what turns six photos into a film.

Short style tag — paste THIS with each shot (not the whole paragraph):

> Cold grey glass city, desaturated cinematic, one warm-toned man among a glassy-eyed crowd, static locked camera, no zoom.

#	Shot (size + angle — keep these different!)	Prompt (style tag + this line)
1	Extreme wide, high angle	High aerial angle looking straight down on a vast grey city intersection, crowds flowing like a river, one tiny warm-lit figure standing still in the center

#	Shot (size + angle — keep these different!)	Prompt (style tag + this line)
2	Medium, from behind	Eye-level from just behind the lone man's shoulder, his warm silhouette moving forward into a dense grey crowd of blurred strangers
3	Close-up, front	Close-up of the lone man's tired warm face, eyes searching, the cold crowd soft and out of focus behind him
4	Wide POV (his eyes)	His point of view: a row of strangers turning to face the camera, all smiling warmly and identically, a wall of friendly faces
5	Macro / extreme close-up	Macro extreme close-up of one stranger's smiling face, sharp focus on the glassy, dead eye and the flawless frozen smile — no life behind it
6	Low angle, wide, behind	Low angle from the ground behind him, the lone warm figure walking away small beneath towering cold glass buildings, the smiling grey crowd flowing around him

💡 The gut-punch is the macro dead eye (shot 5): hold it one beat too long, let the flawless smile become unbearable — then cut hard to him walking away (shot 6).

Sound + voice (heart, not noise)

- Under everything: the muffled hum of a city — but hollow, like it's underwater. Distant, unreal.
- The one real sound: a single, slow, human heartbeat — his — low in the mix, the only living thing you can hear. It's the emotional anchor of the whole scene.
- Shot 4 (the hollow smile): cut the city hum. Just the heartbeat, alone, too loud now.
- Shot 5–6: one sustained, aching cello or piano note — unresolved, human, warm — rising over the heartbeat as he walks away.

- Voice (optional, one line, shot 6, whispered): "A whole city of hearts. Not one of them beating."

Color & tone (this IS the story)

- Everything cold: steel, grey, glass, desaturated blue.
- The lone man: one faint warm tone — skin that still has blood in it.
- The crowd's smiles: bright but colorless. Perfect and dead.
- The contrast between his warmth and their grey is the entire film. Nothing else needs to say it.

End card

> "In a city of plastic hearts,"

> (beat)

> "the one that breaks is the only one that was ever real."

How to make it (simple, one step at a time)

1. Open Flow. Save the lone man as a Character (use the description below) so his face stays the same.
2. Generate the 6 shots one at a time. Paste the short style tag (not the whole paragraph) + each shot's line. Every shot is a different distance and angle, so they won't come out the same — and static + no-zoom is baked into the tag.
3. If any shot zooms, add "static shot, no zoom" to the front and delete any motion words.
4. Stitch 1 → 6 in CapCut.
5. Add the heartbeat under the whole thing; cut the city hum on shot 4; bring the cello in on shots 5–6.
6. Do the color grade last: cool everything down, leave the man slightly warm. CapCut → Adjust → pull temperature cold, then mask the man warmer if you can.

7. Add the end card. Export.

The lone man (save in Flow's Characters tab)

> An ordinary tired man in his mid-30s, lean, short dark unkempt hair, light stubble, warm brown eyes that still hold feeling, a plain worn jacket. The one face in the crowd that looks alive — tired, searching, human. Warm skin tone against a cold grey world.

Why it can earn

- This is a mood film / concept short — exactly what music artists, brands, and festivals want.
- The single-warm-figure-in-a-cold-crowd look is iconic and instantly readable — it photographs like a poster.
- It shows emotional range, not just technical consistency. This is the kind of piece that makes someone say "who made this" — which is how you get hired.

The Cold Down the Spine

A restraint-driven horror piece built around atmosphere rather than spectacle.

The following pages reproduce the original source PDF as part of this curated collection.

Scene — "The Cold Down the Spine" (No Witness)

The horror here is not blood — it's atmosphere. Kindness worn as a mask. Danger in full daylight. Empty roads, a distant siren, no one to witness. That restraint is what makes it hit hard and look premium.

Logline

A bright, silent afternoon on a deserted road. A lone figure. Strangers approach wearing warm, easy smiles — and something in the air goes cold. They come close, they take what they came for, and they leave without a word, without a promise, without ever looking back. The warmth was the weapon.

Master scene prompt (for Flow / Veo)

> Cinematic thriller, harsh midday sun, a silent empty small-town road like a desert — not a soul in sight. A lone figure stands still. From the shimmering heat-haze, two or three strangers approach unhurried, wearing warm friendly smiles that never reach their eyes. The light is bright but the mood is ice. A faint distant siren wails somewhere far off, unanswered. The strangers draw close, calm and pleasant, then the warmth curdles — a flicker of something cold and predatory beneath the smile. Muted bleached color palette, deep shadows under a white sky, 35mm anamorphic, shallow depth of field, unsettling stillness. Static locked-off camera — no zoom, no push-in, no camera movement whatsoever. No dialogue. Dread in broad daylight.

Zoomie fix: the anti-zoom instruction is now built into this master prompt, so it applies to every shot you generate. If one still zooms, add “static shot, no zoom” to that shot's line and delete words like “push-in,” “handheld,” “toward camera,” “closing in.”

🔥 WARM SET (Act 1) — shoot this first

🔥 This is the seduction — pure warmth, nothing wrong yet. Shoot this whole set first, then reuse the EXACT same framing for the cold turn (Act 2): same smiles held a beat too long, light drained white, eyes gone flat. Same setup, temperature stolen. That contrast is the whole film.

Warm-set master prompt (Flow / Veo):

> Cinematic, warm golden afternoon light on a quiet small-town road, soft haze, calm and inviting. A lone tired man stands in the open. Two or three friendly strangers approach unhurried out of the shimmering light, wearing genuine warm smiles, relaxed, hands open and welcoming. The whole frame feels safe, sunlit, almost tender — nothing wrong yet, only warmth. Muted warm honey palette, soft shadows, 35mm anamorphic, shallow depth of field. Static locked-off camera — no zoom, no push-in, no camera movement whatsoever. No dialogue. The calm before anything turns.

Short style tag — paste THIS with each shot:

> Warm golden small-town road, honey afternoon light, friendly relaxed strangers with genuine smiles, safe and inviting, static locked camera, no zoom.

#	Shot (size + angle)	Prompt (style tag + this line)
1	Establishing, wide	Wide static shot of a sunlit small-town road bathed in warm gold, soft haze, one lone figure standing calm, everything safe and inviting
2	The figure, medium	Medium shot of the lone man relaxed, squinting softly into the warm light, guard fully down, at ease
3	The friendly approach	Two or three strangers walking up the road unhurried, open relaxed body language, genuine

#	Shot (size + angle)	Prompt (style tag + this line)
		warm smiles, a friendly wave
4	The welcome, two-shot	Medium two-shot, a stranger close to the man, warm disarming smile, offering an open hand, the moment feels kind and safe
5	The held smile, close-up	Close-up on the warmest, most genuine smile — disarming and human — the last calm frame before the turn

🔄 The cold turn (Act 2): reshoot shots 3–5 with the style tag swapped to "harsh white midday light, the same smiles held a beat too long, eyes flat and cold, the warmth curdling, static locked camera, no zoom" — same setup, temperature drained. Nothing changes but the cold behind the smile.

❄️ COLD SET (Act 2) — the turn

❄️ Same road, same faces, same framing as the warm set — you just drain the warmth. Shoot these with the SAME lone man and strangers characters already saved in Flow, so the faces match Act 1 exactly. That match is the whole trick: it's the same people, turned cold.

Cold-set master prompt (Flow / Veo):

> Cinematic thriller, harsh white midday sun bleaching a silent empty small-town road, deep hard shadows, the air gone cold despite the heat. The same lone man, the same strangers — but now the warm smiles hold a beat too long, the eyes flatten, something cold and predatory surfaces beneath the friendliness. A faint distant siren wails, unanswered. Muted bleached palette, white sky, 35mm anamorphic, shallow depth of field, unsettling stillness. Static locked-off camera — no zoom, no push-in, no camera movement whatsoever. No dialogue. Dread in broad daylight.

Short style tag — paste THIS with each shot:

> Bleached white midday road, cold hard light, the same strangers' smiles held too long with flat dead eyes, predatory stillness, static locked camera, no zoom.

#	Shot (size + angle)	Prompt (style tag + this line)
1	The turn, two-shot	Medium two-shot, the same stranger close to the man, the warm smile now holding a beat too long, the warmth curdling into something else
2	The cold flicker, extreme close-up	Extreme close-up on the smiling face, the eyes going flat, dead and cold, the mask slipping beneath the smile
3	The surround, wide	The strangers standing close around the lone man, calm and pleasant, his face registering cold realization, nowhere left to go
4	The predation (implied)	The strangers close in around the man, then a hard cut to black before contact — we never see it
5	After / no witness, wide	The empty bleached road again, silent and still, the strangers walking away unhurried, never looking back, the distant siren fading

💡 Shot 4 is the kill: cut to black BEFORE contact. What the mind fills in is worse than anything you can show — and it keeps the piece festival-safe and sellable.

Shot breakdown (~25–30 sec)

#	Shot	Prompt (append to the mood above)
1	Establishing	...wide static shot of a deserted sun-blasted road, heat shimmer, total silence, one small lone figure far in the frame, oppressive emptiness
2	The figure	...medium close-up of the lone figure, guard down, squinting in the sun, unaware, calm before the wrongness arrives

#	Shot	Prompt (append to the mood above)
3	The approach	...static shot, no zoom. Two strangers walk slowly up the road toward the man, warm smiles that don't reach the eyes
4	The cold flicker	...extreme close-up on a smiling face, the smile holding a beat too long, the eyes going flat and cold — the mask slipping
5	The predation (implied)	...static shot, no zoom. The strangers stand close around the man, his face registering cold realization, then a hard cut to black before contact — we do not see it
6	After / no witness	...the empty road again, sunlit and silent, the strangers walking away unhurried, never looking back, the distant siren fading

💡 Shot 5 is the key: cut away before anything happens. What the mind imagines is worse than anything you can show — and it keeps the piece sellable, festival-safe, and more chilling.

Voice + background score guide

🎵 The sound is half the dread. Silence does more work than music here. Use it like a weapon.

The voice (if you add one)

Keep it minimal — a few whispered words, not a narration. Use Fenrir (your voice model) if you have it, or record yourself low and close to the mic.

Shot	Voice	How it sounds
1 (establishing)	Nothing	Pure silence
2 (the figure)	A slow exhale	Barely audible, like the sound before you realize you're in danger

Shot	Voice	How it sounds
3 (the approach)	Nothing	Let the footsteps and heat do the work
4 (the cold flicker)	One whispered line: "...warm."	Low, close to mic, almost a breath — the recognition that the warmth was the weapon
5 (the turn-away)	Nothing — HARD SILENCE	Cut everything. Dead air. This is the most powerful sound in the whole piece: none.
6 (after)	The end-card text, read slow: "They never promise. They never return."	Quiet, steady, no emotion — a fact, not a feeling

The background score

Do NOT put music over the whole scene. That kills the dread. Music should appear in only 2 places:

1. Shot 3–4 (the approach + the cold flicker): a single low sub-bass drone — not a melody, just a frequency you feel in your chest. It swells slowly as the strangers approach, peaks when the smile holds too long, then cuts to dead silence on the turn-away in shot 5.
2. Shot 6 (after): a single sustained cello note — low, unresolved, fading — enters under the end-card text and dies out before the video ends. One note. Not a melody. Just the sound of something that will never be answered.

How to do it in CapCut (free)

- Silence: don't add a track. Just let the clips play dry. The absence of sound IS the sound design.
- Sub-bass drone: search CapCut's audio library for "dark ambient" or "drone" — pick the lowest, simplest one. Trim it to shots 3–4 only. Fade in slow, cut hard.
- Cello note: search "cello" or "strings" — pick a single sustained low note. Trim to shot 6. Fade out before the video ends.

- Footsteps: if the clips don't have audio, add soft footsteps from CapCut's sound effects for shot 3 only. Keep them dry, no reverb.
- Siren: search "distant siren" in sound effects. Place it faint in shots 1 and 6 only — far away, never closer.

The golden rule

> Less sound = more dread. Every second of silence in this scene is doing more work than any track could. When in doubt, cut it out.

Color & tone

Color & tone

- Bleached, overexposed whites; the sun as a threat, not a comfort.
- Deep hard shadows. High contrast. Slightly desaturated.
- The wrongness is the contrast: warm light, cold heart.

End card

> "They never promise. They never return."

> (beat)

> "That is why they are the cold down the spine."

The lone figure (save this in Flow's Characters tab)

> An ordinary man in his mid-30s, lean and tired, short dark hair slightly unkempt, light stubble, brown eyes, wearing a faded olive-green jacket over a plain white tee, weathered but not rough — the face of someone who has been alone a long time. No armor. No threat. Just a person standing in the wrong place at the wrong time.

How to make it (simple steps)

🎬 Same as your reel: turn each shot-prompt into a clip, then stitch. One step at a time — don't rush it.

1. Open Flow. Save your lone figure in the Characters tab so the face stays the same across shots.
2. Generate the 6 shots one by one. For each, paste the master scene prompt (the mood paragraph) + that shot's line from the table.
3. On shot 5, remember: cut away before contact. Never show it.
4. Open CapCut. Drop the 6 clips in order (1 → 6).
5. Add the sound: near silence, a faint far-off siren, a low drone that swells — then hard silence on the turn-away in shot 5.
6. Add the end-card text at the finish.
7. Export. Done.

Why it can earn

- Atmospheric psychological thrillers are in demand for shorts, music videos, and brand "mood films."
- It shows range beyond the consistency demo — tension, restraint, tone.
- Restraint (no on-screen violence) keeps it platform-safe and festival-eligible.

The Seduction

A companion work where intimacy itself becomes the site of dread.

Scene — The Seduction (Cold Down the Spine)

The horror here isn't the bedroom — it's the betrayal of intimacy. Warmth offered as a gift, then revealed as bait. The cold down the spine is the moment you realize the tenderness was the weapon. Restraint is everything: imply, never show. What the mind fills in is worse — and it keeps the piece festival-safe and sellable.

The feeling (read this first)

Seduction is trust — a lowered guard, warmth welcomed in. This scene takes that exact safety and turns it cold. Not with anything graphic on screen, but with a smile that holds one beat too long and eyes that go flat. The chill is emotional, not explicit. The tenderness was the trap.

> Don't shoot the seduction. Shoot the moment warmth becomes a weapon.

Logline

An intimate, candlelit bedroom. One person leans close — tender, disarming. The other, feeling safe and wanted, lowers every guard. And in the middle of all that warmth, the smile holds too long and the eyes go cold. The seduction was never tenderness. It was the hunt. The warmth was the weapon.

WARM SET (Act 1) — the seduction

Pure warmth, fully disarming. Nothing wrong yet — only tenderness and safety. Shoot this whole set first, then reuse the exact same framing for the cold turn: same face, same bed, the warmth drained out. Same setup, temperature stolen.

Warm-set master prompt (Flow / Veo):

> Cinematic, intimate warm bedroom at night, low golden candlelight and soft lamp glow, sheer curtains stirring, warm amber shadows. Two people sit close at the edge of the bed; one is a young woman of engineered, performed beauty — heavy flawless makeup, a cosmetically perfect face, a practiced seductive confidence, magazine-alluring and self-assured; the other is calm, safe, wanted. Slow, unhurried intimacy — fully clothed, tender, emotional. Muted warm amber palette, glowing skin tones, shallow depth of field, 35mm anamorphic, quiet stillness. Static locked-off camera — no zoom, no push-in, no camera movement whatsoever. No dialogue. The tender calm before the warmth turns.

Short style tag — paste THIS with each warm shot:

> Intimate warm candlelit bedroom at night, golden amber light, two people close and tender, safe and disarmed, cinematic, static locked camera, no zoom.

#	Shot (size + angle)	Prompt (style tag + this line)
1	Establishing, wide	Wide static shot of a warm candlelit bedroom at night, two figures sitting close at the edge of the bed, soft and safe, golden light everywhere
2	The seducer, close-up	Close-up on the seducer's engineered beauty — heavy flawless makeup, a cosmetically perfect contoured face, a practiced seductive confidence, magazine-alluring, candlelight glowing on the constructed surface
3	The one seduced, close-up	Close-up on the other person, disarmed and trusting, guard fully down, eyes soft, feeling completely safe

COLD SET (Act 2) — the turn

❄️ Same bedroom, same faces, same framing — you just drain the warmth. Amber light cools to steel-blue, the tender smile holds a beat too long, the eyes go flat and dead. Use the SAME characters saved in Flow so the faces match Act 1 exactly. That match is the whole gut-punch: it's the same person, turned.

Cold-set master prompt (Flow / Veo):

> Cinematic thriller, the same intimate bedroom but the warmth is draining out — golden candlelight cooling to cold steel-blue, shadows deepening. The seducer's practiced seductive smile now holds a beat too long; behind the flawless performed surface something cold and hollow surfaces — the beautiful mask with nothing real behind it, empty and predatory beneath the allure. The other's face slowly registers the chill — the dawning that the tenderness was a trap. Muted palette cooling from amber to blue, shallow depth of field, 35mm anamorphic, unsettling stillness. Static locked-off camera — no zoom, no push-in, no camera movement whatsoever. No dialogue. Dread inside intimacy.

Short style tag — paste THIS with each cold shot:

> Same candlelit bedroom cooling to cold steel-blue, the sweet childlike smile held too long, eyes flat and dead, predatory stillness, cinematic, static locked camera, no zoom.

#	Shot (size + angle)	Prompt (style tag + this line)
4	The cold flicker, extreme close-up	Extreme close-up on the seducer's face, the practiced seductive smile holding a beat too long, and behind the flawless performed surface something cold and hollow surfacing — the beautiful mask with nothing real behind it
5	The realization, close-up	Close-up on the other person's face registering the chill, the dawning cold realization that the tenderness was a weapon
6	After / no witness, wide	The empty bedroom at dawn, cold steel-blue light, candles guttered out, the bed disturbed, one figure

		gone, silent and still — no witness

💡 The kill is shot 4 → 5: hold the too-long smile until it's unbearable, then cut to the realization. Never show anything after. What the mind imagines is worse — and it keeps the piece platform-safe and festival-eligible.

Sound + score (same restraint that eats)

- Under the warm set: near silence — soft breath, the faint stir of curtains, one low warm hum. Intimate, safe.
- Shot 4 (the flicker): the warm hum curdles into a low sub-bass drone — the frequency you feel in your chest, not a melody.
- Shot 5 (the realization): cut everything. Hard dead silence. The most powerful sound in the piece is none.
- Shot 6 (after): a single sustained cello note, low and unresolved, fading before the end card.
- Voice (optional, one whispered line, shot 4): "...you're safe." — said the instant it stops being true.

> Less sound = more dread. Every second of silence does more work than any track.

Color & tone (this IS the story)

- Act 1: warm amber, candlelight, glowing skin — total safety.
- Act 2: the exact same room draining to cold steel-blue — nothing changes but the temperature behind the smile.
- The grade is the twist. Do it last in CapCut: start warm, pull temperature cold from shot 4 on.

End card

> "The warmest hands"

> (beat)

> "are the ones that hold you still."

Characters (save in Flow's Characters tab)

The one seduced (reuse your lone figure):

> An ordinary person in their mid-30s, lean and tired, warm brown eyes that still hold feeling, the face of someone who wants to be wanted — trusting, disarmed, human.

The seducer:

> Built on the real Angela Hayes from American Beauty — the one you only see if you "look closer," not the surface everyone remembers. Angela is not wholesome innocence. She is a performance of seductive, worldly confidence — a young woman who cakes on the makeup, plays up her sex appeal, and projects a self-assured, desirable, magazine-model allure, all to prove to the world she is not ordinary. The entire seductive persona is a construction. That is the whole point of her: gorgeous, confident, alluring on the outside — hollow and empty underneath. The American Beauty rose: flawless on the surface, rotting at the roots. So the seducer is a young woman whose beauty is engineered and performed — heavy flawless makeup, a narrow sharp jaw, a cosmetically perfect contoured oval face, a practiced seductive ease. The face is real and human; everything presented is manufactured. And in this scene, what waits behind the performance is not a frightened child — it is cold, hollow nothing. The performance is the bait; the emptiness is the hook.

How to make it (one step at a time)

1. Open Flow. Save both characters so faces stay identical across shots.
2. Shoot the warm set (shots 1–3): style tag + each line. All tender, all safe.
3. Shoot the cold set (shots 4–6): same characters, cold style tag. Same faces, drained.

4. On shot 5, remember: cut before anything happens. Never show it.
5. Stitch 1 → 6 in CapCut. Add the sound: near-silence, drone on 4, dead silence on 5, one cello note on 6.
6. Grade last: warm for 1–3, cold steel-blue for 4–6. Add the end card. Export.

Why it can earn

- Intimate psychological-thriller mood pieces are exactly what music artists, brands, and festivals want.
- The warm-to-cold single-room turn is iconic, readable, and cheap to shoot — one location, two characters.
- It shows emotional range and restraint, not just technical consistency — the kind of piece that makes someone ask "who made this."
