

Scene — Plastic Hearts in a Concrete Jungle

This one is not built from craft. It's built from the ache. A city full of warmth that isn't warmth. A thousand smiles, not one of them alive. And one flesh heart walking through it — the only one that can still break, because it's the only one that was ever real.

The feeling (read this first, before any prompt)

The desert road was the fear — predators in the open, nowhere to hide. This is the loneliness — predators everywhere, dressed as friends. The concrete jungle isn't empty. It's full. That's the horror. Every face smiles. Every hand reaches out warm. And every heart is plastic — molded to look like love, cold when you finally touch it. You are the one real heart in the grey forest. It hurts because it's real. A plastic heart never aches. That's the trade it made.

> Don't shoot the cold. Shoot the loneliness of being the only warm thing in a warm-looking world.

Logline

A man walks through a crowded city street. Everyone smiles at him — warm, kind, welcoming. He reaches back. And one by one, up close, the smiles are perfect and hollow, the eyes glassy like mannequins. He is surrounded by warmth and utterly alone. The only beating heart in a city of plastic ones.

Master scene prompt (for Flow / Veo)

> Cinematic, emotional, a crowded modern city street between towering glass buildings, cold overcast daylight, a river of well-dressed people flowing past. One ordinary tired man moves against the current, searching faces. The crowd smiles at him — warm, welcoming, too perfect — but their eyes are glassy and empty, like beautiful mannequins. Muted desaturated palette, steel and grey and glass, one faint warm tone on the lone man only. Melancholic, still, dreamlike. Static locked-off camera — no zoom, no push-in, no camera movement whatsoever. No dialogue. The loneliness of being the only real heart in a crowd.

🔑 The single most important instruction: the lone man is the only warm-colored thing in the frame. Everyone else is cool, grey, glassy. That one warm tone is his living heart. Let the color carry the whole story.

Shot breakdown (~25–30 sec)

🎬 Why they came out monotonic: you were pasting the whole master paragraph into every shot, so Flow kept rebuilding the same wide street. Two fixes: (1) paste the short style tag below instead of the full paragraph, and (2) give every shot a different camera distance and angle — wide, then medium, then close, then macro. Varied framing is what turns six photos into a film.

Short style tag — paste THIS with each shot (not the whole paragraph):

> Cold grey glass city, desaturated cinematic, one warm-toned man among a glassy-eyed crowd, static locked camera, no zoom.

#	Shot (size + angle — keep these different!)	Prompt (style tag + this line)
1	Extreme wide, high angle	High aerial angle looking straight down on a vast grey city intersection, crowds flowing like a river, one tiny warm-lit figure standing still in the center

#	Shot (size + angle — keep these different!)	Prompt (style tag + this line)
2	Medium, from behind	Eye-level from just behind the lone man's shoulder, his warm silhouette moving forward into a dense grey crowd of blurred strangers
3	Close-up, front	Close-up of the lone man's tired warm face, eyes searching, the cold crowd soft and out of focus behind him
4	Wide POV (his eyes)	His point of view: a row of strangers turning to face the camera, all smiling warmly and identically, a wall of friendly faces
5	Macro / extreme close-up	Macro extreme close-up of one stranger's smiling face, sharp focus on the glassy, dead eye and the flawless frozen smile — no life behind it
6	Low angle, wide, behind	Low angle from the ground behind him, the lone warm figure walking away small beneath towering cold glass buildings, the smiling grey crowd flowing around him

💡 The gut-punch is the macro dead eye (shot 5): hold it one beat too long, let the flawless smile become unbearable — then cut hard to him walking away (shot 6).

Sound + voice (heart, not noise)

- Under everything: the muffled hum of a city — but hollow, like it's underwater. Distant, unreal.
- The one real sound: a single, slow, human heartbeat — his — low in the mix, the only living thing you can hear. It's the emotional anchor of the whole scene.
- Shot 4 (the hollow smile): cut the city hum. Just the heartbeat, alone, too loud now.
- Shot 5–6: one sustained, aching cello or piano note — unresolved, human, warm — rising over the heartbeat as he walks away.

- Voice (optional, one line, shot 6, whispered): "A whole city of hearts. Not one of them beating."

Color & tone (this IS the story)

- Everything cold: steel, grey, glass, desaturated blue.
- The lone man: one faint warm tone — skin that still has blood in it.
- The crowd's smiles: bright but colorless. Perfect and dead.
- The contrast between his warmth and their grey is the entire film. Nothing else needs to say it.

End card

> "In a city of plastic hearts,"

> (beat)

> "the one that breaks is the only one that was ever real."

How to make it (simple, one step at a time)

1. Open Flow. Save the lone man as a Character (use the description below) so his face stays the same.
2. Generate the 6 shots one at a time. Paste the short style tag (not the whole paragraph) + each shot's line. Every shot is a different distance and angle, so they won't come out the same — and static + no-zoom is baked into the tag.
3. If any shot zooms, add "static shot, no zoom" to the front and delete any motion words.
4. Stitch 1 → 6 in CapCut.
5. Add the heartbeat under the whole thing; cut the city hum on shot 4; bring the cello in on shots 5–6.
6. Do the color grade last: cool everything down, leave the man slightly warm. CapCut → Adjust → pull temperature cold, then mask the man warmer if you can.

7. Add the end card. Export.

The lone man (save in Flow's Characters tab)

> An ordinary tired man in his mid-30s, lean, short dark unkempt hair, light stubble, warm brown eyes that still hold feeling, a plain worn jacket. The one face in the crowd that looks alive — tired, searching, human. Warm skin tone against a cold grey world.

Why it can earn

- This is a mood film / concept short — exactly what music artists, brands, and festivals want.
- The single-warm-figure-in-a-cold-crowd look is iconic and instantly readable — it photographs like a poster.
- It shows emotional range, not just technical consistency. This is the kind of piece that makes someone say "who made this" — which is how you get hired.